HOW TO WRITE

ders Perpetrated.

Writing a telegram requires more skill and thought than some persons are aware. Some blunders are amusing, while many are very annoying, or cause serious less. A father, called away from home by imperative business while a favorite daughter was in weak health, desired his wife to telegraph daily how the young lady might be. He was horrified one day by receiving a dispatch: "Mary had a child last night." What the good mother wrote, or meant to write, was: "Mary had a chill." How do such blunders originate? There are several causes of mistakes peculiar to telegraphing. A distinct handwriting is very important, yet often lacking. The shelf furnished for writing the dispatch at many of the offices is inconvenient, the pencil is often a mere stick, and nient, the pencil is often a mere stick, and the crowd and unaccustomed circumstances embarrass one to whom sending a dispatch is an unusual event. Ladies, in particular, if trained to a fine, delicate handwriting, do not realize how needful it is to form the letters large and plain. And many good business men are unaware how liable an oper-tor is to mistake words written in a hand tor is to mistake words written in a mand which, though tolerably good is, of course, unfamiliar to him. A dispatch should never be written in a hurry. Take time enough to write plainly. One should be careful, also, that the language will be clear and lucid to the person to whom the message is sent. Most writers think only of the matter of the message as it rests in their own mind. They do not stop to consider whether all the cirdo not stop to consider whether all the circumstances are fully known to the other party. In this way ambiguous language creeos in. The message is perfectly plain to the sender, and is correctly forwarded, but the recipient is puzzled. For example, one coming to the city, and meaning to call upon a friend soon after arrival, might carelessly express a message thus; "Shall come to-mor siderable effort in the order named above. At the go Daylight took the lead; Rowdy Boy second, Brian Brou third. At the go Daylight took the lead; Rowdy Boy second, Brian Brou third. At the go Daylight took the lead; Rowdy Boy second, Brian Brou third. At the go Daylight took the lead; Rowdy Boy second, Brian Brou third. At the go Daylight took the lead; Rowdy Boy shall arrive. "To-morrow" is perfectly plain to the writer, but the reader must scan the message carefully to ascertain on what day it was dated. "Hope to see" will leave the reader perplexed whether he is expected to call upon his friend, or wait the latter's by the crowd.

Scoond Heat,—Brian first, Rowdy Boy second and Daylight third, and all well bunched, a position which was not altered in the least during the entire heat, giving Boy second and Daylight third. Blackwood's Magoziae narrates this incident—
"A lady telegraphed: 'Send them both.' Thanks.' She meant: 'I thank you, send them both.' Now the Morse telegraph does not send stops, and its 'b' and 'th' are not unlike. Hence, when the receiving operator read: 'Send them both hin, he corrected the missise from the use of figures. Indeed, the directions usually given by the companies are that numbers must always be written out in words. In one instance an written out in words. In one instance an order relative to the sale of goods gave 3000 as the number to be supplied, but the message as delivered read 8000. Now the figures three and eight are easily mistaken. The compositor of a religious newspaper recently inisences of events when he was a boy it 839 with the figures 1339; thus establishin the editor's age at the patriarchal number of 541 years and more. Likewise an addition or omission of a cipher may easily happen. Some one telegraphed for 500 barrels, but the message received by the merchant read 5000 barrels; which caused a heavy loss. An agent merchant received a dispatch reading, "Send one hundred eight-dollar blue-and-orange." He sent shawls accordingly; but instead of a draft for the price there came a letter ex-plaining that "One handsome eight-dollar blue and-orange" was what was wanted. Two merchants once negotiated several days by letter respecting a purchase by one from th seller thus: "Send the rifles." He supposed of course, that the lot of fifty, about which the two had been writing, was meant, and sent them accordingly. This was a mere blunder of an operator, yet it illustrates the importance of taking thought, when writing telegrams, how the language will be understood by the operators and the recipient.
